F.

F (ef), the sixth letter of the Roman alphabet, represents historically the 6th letter (waw) of the Semitic alphabet, which expressed the sounds of w (approximately) and the related vowel u. In early Greek writing the letter had at first the same twofold power but subsequently its accidental varieties of form came to be differentiated in function, the form F (retaining the 6th place in the alphabet) being appropriated to the consonantal use, while V or Y served for the vowel, and is the source of the Roman U V, Y, as explained under those letters. As the sound w was lost in the chief literary Greek dialects of the classical period, its sign F (called by the grammarians from its form the DIGAMMA) is not included in the later Greek alphabet. In the Roman adoption of the Greek alphabet the sound given to the 6th letter was the voiceless labiodental spirant (f). In OE the letter retained the sound (f) unless it stood between two vowels when it was pronounced as the corresponding voiced spirant (v). In the S W, according to some scholars the voiced sound was used also initially. In mod Eng F is always sounded (f), exc in the word of, where it is voiced to (v) through absence of stress.

In MSS a capital F was often written as ff. A misunderstanding of this practice has caused the writing of Ff or ff at the beginning of certain family names, e.g. FFennes, FFoulkes.

II Used as a symbol with reference to its place (6th) in the alphabet.

1 F, f, f is used to denote anything occupying the sixth place in a series. (Cf A, B C, etc.)

2 In Music F is the name of the 4th note of the diatonic scale of C major, called F in Germany, fa in France and Italy. Also the scale or key which has that note for its tonic. F clef the bass clef (see CLEF 1), placed on the line in the stave appropriated to the note F, its form [image] or [image] is said to be a corruption of that of the letter.

Fade (fēd), *a*2 Also 3 vad, 5 faed ?a ? fade vapid, insipid, dull, faded, according to M Gaston Paris (Mém de la Soc de Ling I 90) repr L vapidum (see VAPID), cf OF rade —L rapidum, maussade —L male sapidum

The great difficulty is the anomalous representation of l v by f; the apparent parallel in OF feu (mod fou) — t ecem is questionable the f in that case being prob due to sentence-combination The ordinary view that fade descends from L fatuum foolish, also insipid (whence Pr fats fem fade, in same senses) is inadmissible on phonological grounds, but it is possible that early confusion with this word may have given rise to the change of v into f No OF vade* has been found if it existed it would explain the Eng vade var of FADE v which is otherwise difficult to account for, as the Eng dialects that have v for f usually retain f in Romanic words Cf Fr dial (Lyons) vadon (fem. vadonne), repr L. type rapidonem*]

The current view, which connects the word with fault, is untenable, on the grounds that fal or fel has always been written with the l, and is so pronounced in the dialects in which it occurs, whereas in fault the l is an etymologizing insertion, which rarely occurs in spelling before 16th c, and was not pronounced, even by educated speakers, till much later (But it is not unlikely that association with fault may have coloured the recent use of the word) It seems possible that sense 1, 'to stumble,' may have been developed from the sense 'to be entangled' (Falter v) On the other hand it is noteworthy, that Mid Du falde (= Flem velde) used of the limbs and the tongue in the sense 'to give way, fail, falter,' perh fal er may be a frequentative of falden, formed irregularly through the influence of approximately synonymous vbs like balter, totter, walter)

The history of the sense appears to be as follows In the 13th c the word (in latinized form farsa, farsatura) was applied in France and Eng and to the various phrases interpolated in litanies between the words Kyrie eleison & Christe, & Kyrie, genitor ingnite, vera essentia, eleison"), to similar expansions of other liturgical formulæ, and to expository or hortatory passages in French (sometimes in rime) which were inserted between the Latin sentences in chanting the epistle (The related vb I farcire, OF farcir &c stuff, hence to 'pad out, interlard, was used in the same connexion in the expressions epistola farcita, un benedicamus farsi See Du Cange s vv Farsa, Farsura, and Burney Hist Music II 256) Subsequently the OF farce, with similar notion, occurs as the name for the extemporaneous amplification or 'gag', or the interludes of impromptu buffoonery which the actors in the religious dramas were accustomed to interpolate into their text Hence the transition to the modern sense is easy (The Lucchese farsa, farcire, referred to above, have been antedated by mod writers on liturgical antiquities as FARSE sb and v)]

The change from the strong to the weak conjugation seems to have been due in part to the influence of the derivative vb FERE, which in Eng had the same sense, though in the other Teut langs its equivalent expressed the transitive sense 'to carry'. In the present stem this vb became obsolete before 14th c., but its pa t and pa pple ferde (in northern dialects also fard) continued in use, virtually serving as inflexions of fare. The irregular wk vb thus produced (fare, fared) became regular (fare, fared) before the 16th c. The strong pa t, already comparatively infrequent in Me., seldom appears after 15th c. exc. in Sc., of the strong pa pple we have no examples after 16th c.]

The spelling in our quots is uniformly with d until 16th c, exc. that faþer occurs sporadically in the Cotton and Gottingen MSS of the Cursor Mundi (a 1300), but the pronunciation (ð) may have been widely current in the 15th c. or even earlier, in 14 15th c the spelling with -der is very common in words like brother, feather, leather, though this spelling cannot in all cases be supposed to indicate that the writers pronounced the words with (d) The mod Eng father (fā·ðəɹ) for OF afer, ader in father and mother is often wrongly said to be due to the analogy of brother, or to Scandinavian influence, it is really the result of a phonetic law common to the great majority of Eng dialects, other examples in standard Eng are gather, hither, together, weather At present nearly all dialects pronounce father and mother with (ð) as in standard Eng, in various parts of the north of England and the north Lowlands (d), alveolar or dental, is sometimes heard The representation of OE æ, a by (ā) in this word is anomalous, the only parallel case, setting aside the class of instances in which the symbol (d) is used in this Dict, is rather Among the chief variant pronunciations in dialects are fa·ðəɹ, fā·ðəɹ (by writers of dialect books often spelt faither, feyther), fī·ðəɹ, &c fə·ðəɹ, etc.

In OE the genitive had the two forms fæder (cf OS fader, OHG. fater, ON foður) and fæderes e As a prefix to the name of a priest Also abbreviated F, Fr

Formerly, as still in Continental use, restricted to the regular clergy (see b) In the present century this is become the customary English mode of designating a Roman Catholic priest, even among those not of his own com munion but some secular title is still borne, the title as incorrect, preferring to be addressed as 'The Rev A B' The abbreviated forms are seldom used exc by Roman Catholics.

As the prefix 'Father' was in the 16th c used only with the names of members of religious orders, its use was of course not continued in the reformed Church of England Of late years the title has been applied among a section of the High Church party, to Anglican priests, and some prominent members of that section are very commonly designated by it

Latté considers Faubourg, formerly also spelt faux bourg (= 'false borough') to be a corruption of the earlier recorded synonym forsbourg (f fors outside + bourg borough) which is the source of some of the Eng forms given above The word faubourg, faux bourg, seems not to be known in F before 1381 c, but was evidently in use in 1280 as implied by I fauxes burgins in a charter cited by Du Cange Its origin may possibly be found in the MHG phalburge (also spelt falborge), which according to German scholars originally meant 'burghers of the pale,' the persons living outside the castle wall but within the palisade', it afterwards denoted a special class of non resident burghers, having only partial civic rights The word occurs frequently in the imperial charters of 13–14th c, sometimes latinized as phalburgensis, and a charter of 1365, according to a French translation, speaks of 'les bourgeois et habitans de ces faux bourgeois dits en allemand Pfalbourgers' From these facts it seems not unlikely that faubourg, faux bourg, may have been evolved from phalburgensis or its punning translation falsus burgensis, faux bourgeois]
